Abstract
The concluded 2015 general elections brought APC to power. Prior to the election, the party, during the electioneering period were canvassing for change in all aspects. What was not clear was if the change mantra slogan was for positivity or negativity. It is barely 14 months since APC emerged as the ruling party; the question is to what extent has the ruling party delivered the promised 'change?' Limiting the scope of the paper to the economic sector of Nigeria, this paper looks at the manifestations of this change. Following the happenings in the country, an assessment of this slogan becomes pertinent. It employs the Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA) theory for its analysis. With the framework of CDA, this paper examines some of the speeches of Buhari during the electioneering period where he identified the flaws of the PDP government which formed the basis of the change mantra. The research finds out that the change that was promised Nigerians are manifesting more negatively than positively. The economy is in shambles. The actualisation of the campaign promise of equating dollar with naira is not forthcoming. Prices of goods and commodities are on the high increase. The paper concludes that the change is moving towards the negative direction and something fast needs to be done to resuscitate the dwindling economy.
